Abstract

Vladimir Lossky (1903-1958) is an outstanding theologian of the Russian diaspora and, also, one of the most important Orthodox theologians of the twentieth century. In the present study we are stopping on the notion of tradition in his thinking, which we are analyzing in relation with other theological concepts: Church , Scripture and dogma. Also, our analysis is done through the work of other religious philosophers and theologians of the twentieth century to demonstrate how Lossky was concerned to make „dogmatic for today's man” (D. Stăniloae).
